A Relational Approach to Complexity

Through Awareness, Relation and Action

Why Me-We-World?

Many interventions fail not because they are poorly designed, but because they overlook the relational field: how people perceive, interpret, trust, and coordinate within complex situations.

Me-We-World (MWW) offers a way to understand complexity by focusing on how meaning moves, not only on how systems are structured.

The Human Layers

Every situation unfolds through three inseparable layers:

Awareness — what becomes visible or felt.

Relation — how perspectives align, collide or resonate.

Action — how movement becomes possible.

These layers form a continuous loop of Noticing → Relating → Acting, the core of the MWW Practice.

The Double Lens: Law & Ethics

Effective change requires both Law (structure, agreements, governance) and Ethics (sensitivity, interpretation, care).

Law stabilises; Ethics navigates.

Together they reveal where tension signals an opportunity for meaningful action.

Me–We–World Perspectives

MWW interprets situations through three perspectives:

ME — autonomy, identity, responsibility

WE — trust, shared meaning, interdependence

WORLD — systemic, institutional and ecological structures

The MWW Reading helps identify where tension sits, how it moves, and what it asks from us.

STUART: Human Qualities as Ethical Resonance

STUART (Safety, Trust, Understanding, Awareness, Relaxation, Togetherness) describes how humans feel and interpret relational tension.

It is not a list of values but a resonance field that supports ethical perception within complexity.

The MWW Practice

MWW is a practice, not a method. It strengthens:

- Awareness: perceive without collapsing complexity
- Relation: bring perspectives into coherence
- Action: act with clarity rather than control

Applicable in education, governance, innovation, community development and systemic transition work.

A Relational Future

MWW invites us to approach change as a relational phenomenon: not designed from above, but lived from within.
